Austin American-Statesman Reporter

Joshunda Sanders, 30, is a multimedia public safety reporter at the Austin American-Statesman. She has been a writer at several newspapers over the past 8 years and covered public safety in Central Texas for the Statesman since 2005.

She anchors early morning breaking news coverage and writes enterprise stories about law enforcement issues. She also takes photos, shoots video and writes blogs.

Joshunda writes about the nature of police work, trend stories about crime and profiles of people who affect investigations in Central Texas. She is also a part-time, second-year graduate student at the University of Texas Austin's School of Information, where she studies library and information science.

She's originally from the Bronx, but has lived and been a reporter for newspapers in Beaumont, TX; Seattle, WA; and San Francisco and Oakland, CA. Her creative writing has been published in several anthologies; she has also added her byline to textbooks, encyclopedias and poetry collections.
